Montclair: Arts of the Native American

By MURIEL JACOBS

ROM the more than 5,000 artifacts in the American Indian collection at the Montclair Art Museum, the curator Janet Cooke has selected about 100 objects for display in an exhibition, primarily of baskets, entitled "The Spider and the Snake.'

The show, which opened last September, will run through July 31.

Few people fail to respond to the appeal of American Indian art in the traditional forms of pottery, jewelry, blankets and baskets.

Because even fewer shops and galleries resist the temptation to display these craftworks for sale, buyers are likely to encounter a sensory feast in old and new forms, indigenous work and less obviously identified varia-tions incorporating imported materiwhich an object was made is an established means of tracing early trade and migration routes.

More than a century ago, the Indians who came to trade at Bent's Old Fort on the Sante Fe Trail in southeastern Colorado began working small Venetian glass beads into clothing and ceremonial objects. Some of these items were discovered, still boxed, in obscure storage and are displayed once again among the goods and provisions on the shelves at the recreated general store inside the Indian baskets are primarily utilitarian, made in enormous quantity and considerable variety for container use. Principally for this reason, they are ubiquitous in antiques shops throughout the country. Baskets that were heavily used disintegrated, no matter how marvelously embellished; of those that have survived and surfaced for sale, most are more ordinary than the examples sought by serious collectors.

More-obvious sources for investment-quality antique baskets are knowledgeable dealers who specialize in Amerind items and the dissolution of collections at auction or pri-

Of the older baskets that have survived, and are representative of excellent workmanship and condition, most were undoubtedly brought into the trading posts or were made for the tourist market. Many were commisioned or acquired unused by anthropologists and others working with the Indians, living among them and documenting their customs and continuous acquisitions made by museums, as well as the acceptance (and storage) of bequests, tend to make public collections superb reference sources.

The Montclair Museum's exhibition represents a fraction of its collection of more than 1,000 Indian baskets, according to Mrs. Cooke, the museum's curator of education. Most of the baskets and other objects on display are part of the Rand Collection of American Indian Art in the museum's permanent collection. Other donors and purchases are also

The exhibition is spare and compelling, beautifully mounted and nicely annotated with an appeal directed toward both young people and adults. Few of the baskets on view are much more than 100 years old; none precedes the arrival or influence of the Conquistadores, the mountain men, traders and settlers.

Still, traditional designs persist and innovations fascinate.

Baskets constructed for everyday use by coiling, plaiting, twining or wicker work are imbued with the excellence and suitability of material, singular adoption of design to use and the technical mastery and individuality that characterize the finest folk

Ceremonial objects and clothing, all examples of fine basketwork, poignantly dramatize the passing of some of the rich cultural traditions of the tribes of the Eastern woodlands, the desert Southwest, California, the Pacific Northwest, Alaska and the Aleutian Islands.

There are baskets from the Northeast made of ash and elm, yucca and cattail baskets from the Southwest, California baskets of hazelwood and willow and cedar and spruce baskets from the Northwest.

Some are decorated with vegetable dye, others with the chemistry of aniline dye used in later rugs. Some baskets are embellished with silk yarn, beads, shells or a dense coat of small, brilliantly colored feathers.

These, made by the Pomo basketmakers, were symbolically worked in bright red from the woodpecker, yellow from the meadowlark, blue from the blue jay, green from the mallard and black from the quail.

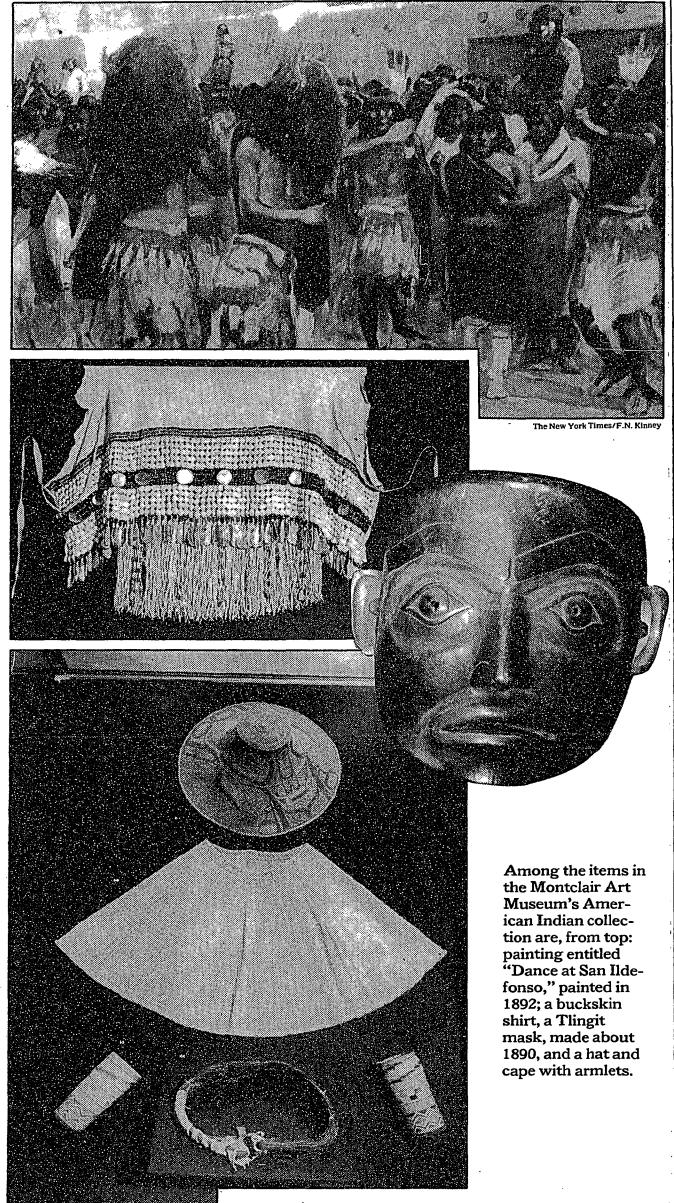

The Montclair Art Museum is at 3 South Mountain Avenue at the corner of Bloomfield Avenue.

Hours are 10 A.M. to 5 P.M. Tuesday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday, 2 to 9 P.M. on Thursday and 2 to 5 P.M. on Sunday. The museum is closed on Mondays.

The general donation is $2 ($1 for the elderly and full-time students over the age of 18). Those under 18 are admitted free. No admission is charged on Thursdays.
